

Competitive Analysis - CallingIn

Objective

Evaluate potential app competitors to the app concept “CallingIn,” which offer conflict management and resolution tools and tips. Below we have included a definition of the concept for CallingIn, and the top conflict management and resolution apps which would stand as competitors in the market.

CallingIn Concept

Calling In is an app designed to spur reconnection between individuals who are in conflict or are estranged from one another, by facilitating conflict management, mediation and resolution on a one on one basis. For the purposes of this analysis, CallingIn is defined as an app geared toward helping individuals send a “Call In” to a loved one who they have lost touch with or experienced a rift with. The process is initiated by an individual (User A) who wishes to work toward repair with another individual (User B). At launch, CallingIn asks User A a series of questions to determine the relationship they are hoping to repair, the nature of the conflict, and any strategies User A has already employed to spur repair without success. Once this data is absorbed, CallingIn provides User A with a selection of prompts to choose from for an invite message to be sent to User B. User A may choose a prompt or write their own, which asks User B to connect with them via CallingIn in an effort towards repair. User B may refuse the request if they are not interested in reconnection or repair with User A. In the case that User B accepts the request, User B is provided with a selection of prompts that they may choose or write themselves, to communicate to User A how they would prefer to move forward (e.g. phone call, text message, written letter, connecting via the app). At each stage, both Users are provided with psychology and research-backed tips for conflict management and resolution to help guide them through the process. At any point in the process, either User may choose to opt out and end the CallingIn connection, with a variety of tools and prompts that help facilitate individuals to diffuse or step away from the conflict in peaceful ways, for self-protection and/or to preserve individual choice and privacy to the level of each user’s requirement.

Overview of Competitors vs. CallingIn

Several products exist to help individuals navigating conflicts. Below is a synopsis for each of four potential competitors to CallingIn, outlining the basic function of each app. In our analysis we discovered that these competitors all offer a variety of conflict management and resolution tools and tips. Some of the apps are useful as a resource for framing, or understanding conflicts more deeply in order to find resolution (Conflict Management, Conflict Resolution), while others focus on gathering data from users to assess their specific conflict and providing an action plan tailored to that user’s experience (Making Conflict Work, Peace Pursuit). Making Conflict Work relies on evidence-based tools for conflict management, while Peace Pursuit specifically caters to users of the Christian faith and follows a biblical process for conflict resolution. All of the competitors evaluated share a common thread of increasing the initial user’s knowledge base in how to navigate conflicts effectively. Most of the competitors’ strategies align with the design concept for CallingIn, including using science-backed techniques and employing both psychological and social science principles to help diffuse conflict. None of the competitors take the additional step of allowing users to invite another party to join them for guidance within the app. Our analysis concludes that this added feature would be a novel and potentially ground-breaking addition that could greatly increase the chance for individuals to resolve interpersonal conflicts.

Making Conflict Work app asks users to share the general specifications of the conflict they are attempting to address and provides an assessment and strategies for effectively navigating the situation.

Product Description:

"Often times, there are many components in conflict that people don't consider that have a big impact on resolution. What are the power dynamics like? What's important to you? Them? How do your goals overlap or diverge? Conflicts are addressed most effectively when the strategy fits the specific situation. However, most of us get stuck in one or two chronic ways of responding to conflicts at work and in our personal lives—and therefore miss many opportunities to get things done and build stronger relationships. Our approach is science-based, building on and extending one of the most influential models in the field of conflict resolution. Our research shows that people who are more adaptive in the face of conflict are happier and healthier at work. But this takes knowledge, skill, and practice. By answering a series of questions about the nature of your conflict, the Making Conflict Work app helps you understand the dynamics at play. Based on your inputs, the app provides you with an assessment of the overall situation, paired with research-based strategies for navigating the conflict most effectively."

Peace Pursuit is an app specifically designed for Christians who are navigating conflicts. Using biblical principles the app provides users with a guide for how to address the conflicts they experience through the lens of the Christian bible.

Product Description:

“A relational conflict can be complicated. Its resolution doesn't have to be. Peace Pursuit provides step-by-step biblical conflict resolution. If you are a follower of Jesus and want to resolve a relational problem, Peace Pursuit can help. The Peace Pursuit App is a step-by-step biblical process which provides users with the necessary tools to address their own conflicts or to assist others who are struggling in their relationships. Users navigate an engaging, interactive peacemaking process that customizes action steps according to their unique circumstances in a relational problem. The app's intuitive design ensures that users can easily grasp and implement biblical principles, whether they find themselves in an “offended” or “offender” role, a third-party “initiator” role, or a “coach” role who helps another person seek peace. As users prayerfully meet with God before they talk with the other party, they identify their own emotions, desires, and motives in the light of biblical principles. They uncover the unmet expectations of one or both parties, which are the root causes of their conflict, and then decide if it is appropriate to have a peacemaking conversation with the other person. Whether users are grappling with personal conflicts, struggling in their marriages, or encountering disputes within their families, churches, or workplaces, Peace Pursuit's empowering and introspective approach equips individuals with the necessary tools to do their part to reach peace. By focusing on personal growth, self-reflection, and aligning their motives and expectations with biblical principles, users can appropriately initiate peacemaking conversations with confidence and clarity, as needed.”
